Hailing from the affluent Pinophyta City just north of Weron, Elizabeth can safely admit that she has seen a rather full life thus far. As well as an interest in the making of chamber music, she aspired to be a surgeon from a very young age, spending four years studying medical science at Weron's Angelika College. She is a red panda hailing from a family of successful creatures, with the Cossey surname having become associated in North Triston with several of the country's largest businesses.

Though her family's wealth means money is not a problem for her, she has expressed less interest in it than her wider family has even defying her parents' insistence that she start her own business. Blending with her brown and white fur is a head of shoulder length brown hair, coupled with a pair of bright blue eyes that are said to always reveal her true desires. Some also say that this is due to others making judgements about her intentions due to the small white heart shape visible between her breasts and neck and the many white dots interspersed in her tail's patterns, though she does not find this especially bothersome.

Her nickname of Jinx comes from the results of many of the operations she has performed. Her colleagues intended this to be an ironic tag due to it having exactly the opposite intended meaning. Instead of bringing harm or misfortune to her patients, a large number of them have instead gone on to achieve spectacular things, even things that were never thought to be possible prior to their surgical procedures.

In particular, she remembers the first times this happened. She had treated the frontwoman of Dissonance, Denise Preston, who she'd diagnosed with Superior Mesenteric Artery Syndrome after she had come in looking like a shadow of her former self. After the operation, she had rapidly recovered her lost weight and had become even more famous than she had been before.

Soon after, she had treated a panther whose arm had been sheared off in a car accident. Not only was she able to successfully reattach his arm, but after the operation, he had gone on to become the director of a company that made golf clubs, thus the nickname came to be. Although some of her colleagues thought this nickname was a teasing one and tried to discourage it, Elizabeth rather liked it, so it stuck.

It has been said that when she's on shift and off, she switches between two distinct personalities, leading to her friends to refer to her as having a Jekyll and Hyde trope despite lacking a violent side. When she's on the job, she has a domineering and very serious approach and makes sure that even the most meticulous details are followed. She is also known to let nothing distract her, not even emergency calls from her family members.

On the other hand, when she's off the job, she's bubbly, playful and outgoing and takes any chance she can to goof off with her friends. She has enjoyed sleepovers since her first one at six years of age, viewing it as a very social outing. While her friends resisted this at first, thinking it was childish, they soon gave in when she insisted and it didn't take long for them to see why her enthusiasm for them never faded.

Though she had not started out seeking a relationship, she couldn't help but engage in a number of flings both inside and outside of the hospital, sometimes even with patients she had treated. In her earlier years, she was sexually adventurous and regularly formed crushes on both men and women. Simultaneously, she is guarded about her bisexuality due to not wanting to risk her job.

One crush she recalls particularly fondly was when she'd formed feelings for a tigress who had specifically requested that she handle her breast expansion surgery. Though she never told her how she felt, nor found out why the tigress had specially requested her, neither of them have been able to forget about the other, especially not after her discovering that her patient had gone on to become a well known glamour model.

Eventually, she met and started to fall for a fellow doctor, an alpaca named Peter who was an optician. Though shy around each other at first, they regularly made excuses to cross each other's paths when they were not busy. At first, she thought it was just another fling. But when they managed to get days off simultaneously, they occupied them with dates, leading to their relationship flourishing like the flowers of spring, as she described it.

Whenever they were parted, he occupied her mind, although it was not until much later that she saw their love as something that could be as permanent as the sun's presence. In 2014, she had managed to get a weekend off that allowed her to attend the biannual Weron Anime and Gaming Convention with her friends, in which she had cosplayed as Pinkie Pie from My Little Pony: Friendship Is Magic. But she had unexpectedly found that Peter had also come with his own friends and had his own cosplay, Ciel Phantomhive from Black Butler.

Despite the immensely different personalities of the characters they portrayed, they frequently hung around with each other and got many photos taken of them together, and by the end of the convention, had shared several passionate kisses. They met much more frequently thereafter and by that summer, he moved in with her. They married on Valentine's Day 2015, although at this time do not plan to bear any cubs due to their busy schedules.

Though she does not treat her life with reckless abandon, she is outgoing, constantly craves social gatherings and has a sense of adventure about her. Despite this, she is very conscious about her health as a result of her lengthy medical training and is routinely seen running and exercising in the time she isn't with her friends or husband. In her rare periods of downtime, she enjoys romance novels and has a liking for many kinds of chocolate and also enjoys chamber music and dancing. She is also a fan of many anime series and on the rare occasions she gets to attend conventions, will not hold back when she cosplays.
