The people of Saffron City fled as far as possible from Violet the Vulpix. Violet felt disappointed by them running, even if she did understand why. After all, who would stay with a hundred-foot-tall Vulpix?

The streets rumbled and shattered underneath her dark red-brown paws. She accidentally stepped on a white car, flattening it and breaking the road. It was as though everything around her, from the buildings and roads to vehicles and signs, were made of paper. The fact that she held little if any, control over her sizeshifting ability only compounded the destruction.

Despite all of that, she proceeded as usual.

After all, everything would be undone.

"It's always nice to travel through these famous cities!" Violet said. She adjusted her large, purple, frilly hat to lay center on her head. "It's a shame that everyone ran away, though."

She kept her head up high with a kind smile on her muzzle. Despite her feral shape, she wore a purple skirt rimmed with gold on her rear. After all, even giant feral Vulpix must look modest when wandering around. Below her knees, she wore four-point diamond-shaped golden rings, which also held a purple skirt that ended with gold.

Her purple with some shades of violet eyes shone in the golden sunlight.

Violet glanced around for any sign of life but saw none.

"I do wish someone would be around," Violet said. She sighed. "Especially one as big as me."

At that point, a poster fluttered by, which crashed against her black nose. She winced and reached up for the large paper. With great care, she pulled it off and motioned to toss it away. She read a bit on the poster and froze.

It said:

Hey there, Violet. I wish to speak with you soon.

From,

A special admirer

"Woah. I-I have a special admirer?" Violet blushed; even her blushing carried a shade of purple. "Who sent this?"

The poster ripped off from her paw and fluttered off. Violet gasped and lunged for it, but it fluttered out of reach and spun around her. Its spinning reminded her of someone dancing with her. She briefly saw the back of the poster, but it always turned away. It carried the shape of Vulpix, but this one had a golden shine for some reason.

It fluttered away, dancing out of reach.

“Hey!”

Violet lunged out for it, stretching out her front legs. She wiggled her front paws, but the poster danced away and avoided her paws. She landed with a thud hard enough to cause an earthquake. Buildings around her collapsed, the streets beneath her crumbled, and dust underneath her rose. She coughed and shook her head.

“I’m not finished with you!” Violet pushed herself off from the ground and chased after it. For some reason, it felt like that large paper was teasing her. That only made her blush a deeper shade of purple. “Get back here!”

The poster wiggled away, exiting out from the city. Violet followed, making another lunge toward the poster. This time, her paw collided with it. She landed with another, louder thud, with the earth shaking. She sighed and giggled.

“Finally. I got it.” Violet smiled and flipped her paw over. “Now, let’s see—”

She blinked at the poster. Was it not bigger a moment ago?

“O-oh no!”

All of a sudden, Violet exploded in size. She grew so fast that not even an afterimage of her rapid growth appeared. The escaped Saffron City’s citizens found themselves under the shadow of the growing Vulpix. She stood up, causing the entire Kanto region to shake. Within half a minute, she grew to ten miles high.

Her growth did not stop.

It had only just begun.

“I can’t stop growing!!” Violet yelled out. Everyone within the Saffron City’s vicinity screamed, with their ears ringing. “No! Stop, please!!”

Despite her pleas, her growing speed only increased. Though humongous was once a word fitting for Violet, even that felt small. Within another second, a single paw dominated both Kanto and Johto simultaneously. Even Legendary and Mythical Pokémon would think twice before facing against Violet.

The planet’s curvature became visible to Violet before the first minute died. She yelped and jumped into the air, into space. The Earth shook from the leap, causing many crevasses throughout. She looked like she remained in place to those still on the planet. A closer look would realize she had grown faster than her exit from Earth.

Her left paw returned to Earth when the first minute of her growth finally died.

It lay snug between two of her toes.

Violet yelped, glancing around. The various planets within the solar system pulled toward her. She turned to the sun, which in one second lay as large as her head and, in the next, became the size of a marble. Jupiter and Saturn brushed against her tails, sinking between her fur.

Her stomach rumbled loud enough to be heard throughout the galaxy.

"Grk! So hungry!" Violet opened her mouth and ate the sun, taking Mercury, Venus, and Mars along the way. "Need more!"

Between a single blink, Violet touched against thousands of stars at once. She chomped hundreds at once, though her hunger remained the same. She grew faster, enough to shove out from the galaxy's arm. Soon, galaxies danced around her, orbiting her like planets to the sun.

She opened her mouth again and ate six at the same time.

Violet sighed; her hunger satiated at the moment. Her face, once its regular shade, returned to blushing at how huge she become. Already, entire galaxies pressed against her fur like dust, with more incoming. The universe's edge became viewable, with her tails pressing against it. By the second minute's death, she had already outgrown the universe.

Violet glanced around at the multiverse floating around her. Her rapid growth finally ended, having stopped herself. She grabbed on her original home universe, with it the size of a baseball to her. It felt warm to the touch.

"O-oh, jeez," Violet said. She hovered the universe to her eye level. "W-well, I hope that my special admirer saw me. Though I bet that—"

"—that he might love every second of it."

Violet blinked and twisted around. "Who—"

To her surprise, another Vulpix about her size hovered toward her with a broad, snickering grin. His fur color, unlike hers, was golden-yellow with buff yellow tails, head curls, and bangs, and sage green paws. His purple eyes glanced at her own.

"I must say, Violet, you sure are an awesome Vulpix," he said. He floated opposite Violet, with the universe in between them. "I must've witnessed you outgrow your universe five times already."

"You saw me?" Violet asked. "But I would've noticed a Vulpix like you."

"I kept my distance. Plus, it's easy when you have powers like mine."

This shiny Vulpix floated back while snickering in glee. Violet leaned her head to the side, focusing on his back and noticing something on it. To her surprise, it held a golden cross-like wheel, much like Arceus, though he wore it on his back rather than around his abdomen. Violet blinked, feeling more questions building up within her."

"Uh, who are you?" Violet asked.

"Why, I'm Kenneth the Vulpix God! Or rather, a Vulpix with a piece of Arceus within him," Kenneth answered. He rubbed the back of his head while his grin turned sheepish. "It's something that I found while on an exploration mission."

"I see." Violet nodded. She still held some doubt in her voice despite the evidence. "Er, how can you find a piece of Arceus? I mean, wouldn't that, well, mean that Arceus is dead? If so, how can your universe still exist?"

"You would think so, especially since Dialga, Palkia, and Giratina have also been shattered. However, I found out that, before they were shattered, they set up the universe to continue running without them." Kenneth nodded. "That was what their shards did until someone claimed them. I believe that they weren't expecting to survive whatever they were fighting, so they prepared."

Part of Violet felt confused by Kenneth's statements, finding them ridiculous. At the same time, the idea of someone or a group somehow destroying the Pokémon of Myth felt horrifying. They must hold just as great power or were simply smart enough to pull it off. Violet glanced at him again and noted how sweet he looked.

"Don't worry. I've been searching for those pieces as well. With time, I'm sure my universe wouldn't rely on it running on autopilot anymore." Kenneth floated close to her again. "You can count on me."

Violet smiled and giggled. "That's good, at least. So," Violet leaned in closer, "you admire me?"

"Why, yes!" Kenneth winked. "I mean, from everything I sensed about you, you're a perfectly normal Vulpix other than being, well, larger than buildings at the best of times. And being larger than the universe in others." Kenneth floated around her as though doing a dance solo. "Me? I had to have a piece of Arceus to reach this size. Don't you think it's impressive to be like a goddess in size?"

Violet blushed at the thought. Her? A goddess? "I, er, never thought of it that way."

"Kekekeke. I thought so." Kenneth approached and nosed her nose. "Shall we do a dance that the multiverse would love to watch?"

Violet smiled. "I love to."

The two Vulpix, one red and the other golden, danced along with the countless universes around them. Violet glanced around and noted how beautiful each one looked. In many ways, it felt as though she lay within a sea of universe-shaped ornaments. Despite Kenneth's odd story, she felt happy to meet him, especially at this size.

Kenneth, for his part, grinned along with her. Though he felt some struggle with finding Arceus's pieces along with the others, it felt nothing like being the only huge one. Finding another Vulpix of his size rejuvenated his happiness. Still, he wished to do the same with his Vulpix girlfriend back home someday.

After fifteen minutes passed, they stopped dancing.

"I guess it's time for me to reset everything," Violet said. "Will you remember?"

"Of course! I am a Vulpix God, after all." Kenneth winked. His sheepishness returned, and he rubbed the back of his head. "Jeez, calling myself a Vulpix God always sounds silly."

Violet giggled. "I hope to meet you again soon. Perhaps you can visit my world someday."

"I plan to. And oh! Before you reset everything, let me give you a special gift."

Kenneth hovered his sage green paws beside each other. He closed his eyes and hummed. At once, a light came from Violet's back left foot-paw and entered between Kenneth's paws. Violet blinked in surprise and glanced back at her paw.

"Huh?" Violet squeaked.

A golden glow came between Kenneth's paws, enough that Violet closed her eyes. It stopped glowing several seconds later, followed by Kenneth chuckling. Violet opened her eyes and gasped.

Earth, encased in glass, lay between them with a golden chain on it. It floated toward Violet, putting itself around her neck. She reached up and touched it, feeling its warm and loving glow.

"Something for you to remember me by," Kenneth said. He grinned wide. "What do you think?"

"I-I think this looks amazing," Violet said. "I'm not sure if I'll still be wearing it once I reset everything."

"One can always hope." Kenneth floated toward her and nosed her nose. "See ya."

"Goodbye," Violet responded.

Violet's body glowed, with every bit of destruction she caused undone. Everyone in her home universe would forget but her.

Well, at least someone else would remember what happened.

At the very least, it meant that she could repeat everything again and still be new.
