Biography

Felicia Rogers was born two years after her elder brother Frederick Rogers. Ironically, she was born on the exact same day as her brother was. At first, her brother didn't pay much attention to her and acted like any other brother. But when she was six years old, she caught a nasty case of pneumonia and nearly died.

Thankfully, their parents were able to get some of the best medical care in the area and Felicia's life was saved by the doctors. After that day, her relationship with Frederick improved and the two of them were close. She decided to follow his footsteps to help him out in her own way.

As a child, Felicia would read stories about super powered fursons out in the world and their exploits. She was utterly fascinated by them and wished to meet them someday. During her school years, however, she was bullied and harassed by jocks and cheerleaders due to her tall, thin appearance. Nevertheless, she followed the same pursuits as her brother and graduated top of her class in high school. Unlike her brother, however, she moved out to attend Stanford University in California.

She pursued a bachelor's degree in technology with a minor in biology. During her time there, her roommate convinced her to take part in a women's wrestling club after school. Felicia soon fell in love with the sport, enjoying the power she felt having her opponents in her mercy. Her body was molded and grew stronger as she continued to practice, giving her a very attractive figure. Her own legs proved to be an asset in the sport, allowing her to humiliate jocks and cheerleaders out of revenge. At one point, she took the local wrestling association by storm, earning her the nickname "The Venus Trap".

However, her career in wrestling came to an end in 2008 when she checked on her brother back in Massachusetts. She learned from his workplace what had happened to him and flew off to Boston to help him in his darkest hour. After he had healed up, Felicia put her wrestling career to the past and obtained her Master's degree back at Stanford. She then flew to Boston and joined her brother at his workplace. Together, the two siblings constructed prototypes for their robots as well as working artificial limbs for handicapped fursons. They saved up their money carefully and in 2013, had bought a vacant medical building in Colmaton, California. The two siblings flew out to Colmaton and opened the Rogers Biotech Institute. Their combined knowledge was able to create working androids that were virtually similar to living fursons. However, the Rogers brother and sister had a hidden agenda...

Felicia had kept her fascination towards supers from her childhood. That fascination soon grew into an obsession. She created her own personal androids, dubbed Succubots and Incubots, to hopefully get a super of her own. The giraffe woman plans to nab supers to understand them both scientifically and sensually...

Personality

Felicia Rogers shows a borderline obsessive fascination towards supers and wishes to know them better through both science and her own wiles. She will tease her captive supers both normally and sexually. Like her brother, she holds respect for those that practice in the various fields of science. However, she also has a grudge against what she calls stereotypical male and female jocks; she will not hesitate to humiliate them in her own way. But if said jock proves to be different than the others and/or is actually kindhearted, she will not bother them. She cares for her brother despite getting into small arguments with him.

Abilities

Felicia shares her brother's knowledge in technology and biology as well as his ego. However, she doesn't develop weapons of her own, relying on her brother's designs. She has an army of Incubots and Succubots, which use pheromones to lull and entice targets into a stupor for capture. Her years as a wrestler allow her to trap opponents in powerful holds, particularly with her legs.
