

Devil May Cry 4 Kyrie Ending Narration:

“This you know: the years travel fast, and time after time I have done the telling. But this is not one’s tale. It’s the tale of us all, and you have to listen and to remember, as what you hear today you have to pass on to the young tomorrow. I am looking behind us now into what is now part of our history. I see those of us who got the luck and started the fight for home, and I remembers how it led us here and how we was glad because we saw what there once was. One look and we knew we had got it straight. Those what had gone before had the knowing and the actions of things beyond our reckoning — even beyond our wildest dreams. Time counts and keeps counting, and we know now: finding the trick of what has been and lost is no easy path, but that is our trek. We need to travel it, and there’s nobody knows where it’s going to lead. Still in all, we do the telling so that we remember who we were and where we came from. But most of all we remember the man who found us and saved us, like his father, he who was half demon but embraced humanity that came a-salvage. And we light the city, not just for him, but for all of him that are still out there. Because we know there will come a night when they see the distant light and they’ll be coming home.”
